

The Indiana Telephone Privacy law has served the purpose exceptionally well since being instituted. There is no reason for the FCC to become involved in this issue. Each state should be fully capable of instituting their own telephone privacy laws. Since the law has been in effect in Indiana we have been able to have a meal without constant interruption. We have been able to set in our easy chairs and rest without answering a ringing phone and then finding that it was a computer generated call and nobody responds to you since somebody else answered their phone first. If the FCC deems it necessary to enter into the telephone privacy law arena, I would suggest that their proposal be no less than what is enjoyed by the citizens of the State of Indiana. Thank You
